U.S. scientists are preparing to study SARS patients in order to determine how long those infected remain contagious, and to test some experimental treatments for the disease, the Associated Press reports.

The National Institutes of Health (news - web sites) will invite some of the 62 people in the United States who are listed as probable SARS cases to travel to its hospital in Bethesda, Md., to be part of the research.

So far, the United States has had 222 suspected cases and 52 probable cases of the severe acute respiratory syndrome.

In other moves to prepare for a possible spike in SARS cases in the United States, the federal government is training health workers, encouraging hospitals to set up isolation wards, and stockpiling ventilators, the AP reports.

The Department of Health and Human Services (news - web sites) (HHS) will buy 3,000 ventilators to add to the national stockpile. HHS would not reveal how many ventilators are in the stockpile but said the additional 3,000 represents a large increase.

U.S. government officials said the country has done a good job of preventing the spread of SARS, but they added that many local communities would be unable to cope with a serious outbreak.
